The global order is crumbling today, not always in a loud and dramatic fashion, but instead over many instances, manifesting as accumulating cracks, a gradual exposure of the weakness of American hegemony, and a frantic scramble among nations and powers seeking a foothold in a world being reshaped. In such moments, nations are not measured by their aspirations, but by their political will, and their ability to seize historical opportunities before they are lost.

However, the tragedy in the Muslim World lies not in the absence of elements of power, but in the presence of rulers who fail to recognize this power, or, even if they do, lack the courage to align themselves with it. Pakistan, with its significant human and military weight and strategic location, continues to be lured into playing the role of a mediator, bound by the rhythm of American interests, instead of assuming a leading, pioneering role that aligns with the nation Ummah and its interests. Egypt, with its historical, political, and geographical weight, continues to strive at pivotal junctures to repair the cracks in American influence instead of recognizing the transformative moment and understanding that subservience does not build a future, but merely delays the downfall of its master.

The pillars of the Muslim World are not lacking in geography, wealth, populations, or armies. Instead, they lack leadership that can see itself in a positive light, and believes that this Ummah has the right to be a maker of history, not its raw material. These rulers, however, have been corrupted by subservience to such an extent that their spirits have diminished until they see themselves only as agents, their countries only as fields of service, and the Ummah only as a population mass to be controlled, not liberated.

Nevertheless, the opportunity is not lost. Indeed, the Ummah may stand today at one of the greatest moments of liberation in its modern history. The world is being reshaped, American hegemony is eroding, and the political vacuum is widening. It is shameful that the Islamic Ummah remains bound to the will of rulers who are dragging it along on a crumbling chariot. The disease lies in the rulers, and the cure lies in the awareness of the Ummah: an awareness that reveals the source of treachery, sees the source of strength, and realizes that whoever possesses the means to rise up cannot be content with the position of a submissive follower.
